PRESIDENT'S NOTE: MELANIE BARNAS-SIMMONS

As we near the end of the year and the end of my term as AFPGV President, I want to take this opportunity to thank the many volunteers who have touched my life. Our members are busy working professionals with families, commitments and responsibilities. Still so many of you find the time to give back to your profession through a volunteer role with AFPGV. Whether you serve on a committee to select scholarship recipients, help plan one of our major events, or serve as a board member leading our chapter to the next level of excellence, you are the backbone of AFPGV.

I can't thank our volunteers enough for their time, talent, and treasure they share with us every day. From young members eager to learn and network, to our seasoned professionals hungry to share their knowledge and mentor the next generation; we are strong, unified and making an amazing impact on the philanthropy in our community. I am proud to be associated with such a high caliber group of professionals!

AGE MATTERS: THE MULTI-GENERATIONAL GIVING OPPORTUNITY

By Jared Longmore

Over the next four decades, approximately $41 trillion in assets will transfer from the Matures (b. 1946 and earlier) and Baby Boomers (b. 1946 – 1964) to the populations known as Gen X (1965 – 1979) and Millennials (b. 1980 – 2000). Take a moment to consider that figure – that's 41 followed by 12 zeroes.

“The Great Wealth Transfer,” as it's come to be commonly known, means that Gen X and Millennials will wield the greatest economic and philanthropic power of any previous generations.

The fundraising practice that relates to this phenomenon is known as multi-generational giving. To learn more about this important topic, I sat down with James Ebenhoch, Endowment/Foundation Consultant at Manning & Napier.

In order to assist Manning & Napier's non-profit, endowment and foundation clients, Ebenhoch has focused some of his efforts on multi-generational giving. Multi-generational giving is complex because at its core are two principles – one that focuses on the individuality of the generations, and one that reviews the practice of transferring wealth within the family unit.

According to Ebenhoch, the best way to think of multi-generational giving is that it “inspires and enables the next generation of donors to continue a legacy of giving established by their parents and grandparents.”

Developing a multi-generational giving strategy begins by understanding the basic differences between the world's living generations. Let's begin with the two generations that donate the most to non-profits today – the Matures and the Baby Boomers.

Matures grew up in an age of political and economic uncertainty, including the Great Depression and World War II. Their experiences lead them to be more conservative and loyal, and they are sometimes noted for their adherence to rules.

“...the strategies that worked well for previous generations (of givers) will need to be tailored for members of Gen X and Millennials.”

Baby Boomers, on the other hand, were brought up in a booming post-war economy. While they inherited many of the Matures' values, growing up with privilege led this generation to feel more special and be more optimistic than previous generations.

These two generations represent nearly 70% of all charitable giving today, and are often associated with responding best to traditional fundraising methods like direct mail campaigns. As a result, they have become the lifeblood of most non-profit development strategies.

Gen X and Millennials are a completely different story. Unlike previous generations, they were raised in a consumer-driven economy, are more independent, and because of technological advances, feel more connected to the world. For both these generations, technology has changed the way they consume products and participate in charitable giving.

Ebenhoch cautions that the strategies that worked well for previous generations will need to be tailored for members of Gen X and Millennials. He offers three straightforward recommendations for non-profits looking to get ahead of the curve.

First, non-profits should use targeted messaging and delivery methods for each generation. Gone are the days where a one-size-fits-all approach to direct mail or email campaigns can be fully successful. Many non-profits already segment by the level of donor, but segmenting by age bracket can also help fundraisers appeal to the specific topics and sensitivities that drive more recent generations.

Non-profits can also prepare for the future by incorporating technology into their giving platforms. According to research conducted in 2014 by the Pew Research Institute, more than 97% of Millennials and Gen Xers own cell phones, and more than 63% use their phones to go online.

This research points to a changing paradigm in the way donors use their phones. According to Ebenhoch, mobile giving strategies are crucial to attracting younger donors. He points out that “Gen X and Millennials will accept a direct mail appeal and won't view it as intrusive, but would much rather use newer technology to receive an appeal.”

Second, address the entire family unit instead of a particular member or generation. This is especially important when dealing with high-wealth families. At Manning & Napier, their Family Wealth Management Group often works with multiple generations to better understand their long-term philanthropic goals. This sort of goal-setting is fluid, but always circles back to family values. “Values drive the next generation of major donors, not valuables,” states Ebenhoch. “And, children learn those values from their grandparents and parents.”

Today’s major philanthropists are very interested in providing their children with hands-on learning activities. These can be simple, like having children go on facility tours and reporting back to the family unit, or more complex—such as having these newer generations help to manage a foundation or donor-advised fund.

Third, non-profits should feel comfortable asking their donors for feedback. The benefits can be numerous. Ongoing donor surveys can help non-profits understand how they are perceived in the community, collect information and grow their database, maximize efficiencies in information delivery, and build stronger relationships between donor and organization.

While adopting multi-generational giving strategies will be easier for some organizations than others, it’s important to view “The Great Wealth Transfer” as an opportunity for your non-profit to clarify its mission and vision, build meaningful 1:1 relationships with donors, and maximize efficiencies by thoughtfully using technology.

At the end of the day, multi-generational giving is about removing barriers to giving and planning for the future – two things that all non-profits should care about.
